Dear Mr. Homan:

A recent media report suggests that Deportation Officers from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement's (ICE) Office of Enforcement and Removal Operations are using stingray surveillance devices to locate individuals in order to arrest and deport them.

As you know, stingrays, also called IMSI catchers, are an extremely controversial surveillance technology. These devices, first created for the military and intelligence community, have in recent years trickled down to federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies. Stingrays are undoubtedly a useful tool for law enforcement agencies—who have a difficult, dangerous, and important job to do. However, the power of this surveillance technology comes with serious collateral costs—stingrays also send probing tracking signals into the homes of innocent people nearby, and can apparently even disrupt their ability to make and receive calls, including to 911.

Stingrays impose too high a toll on communities to be used to investigate low level, non-violent offenses, such as locating individuals who have entered the country illegally or overstayed a visa.

Please provide me with answers to the following questions by June 30, 2017.

1. How many times has ICE used stingrays or similar surveillance technology during each of the last five years to locate individuals in order to arrest and deport them?
2. What policies govern the use of stingrays in immigration enforcement operations?
3. What steps does ICE take during stingray operations to limit interference with or disruptions to the cell phones of innocent Americans?

If you have any questions about this request, please contact Anderson Heiman with the Finance Committee Staff at (202) 224 4515.

Sincerely,

Ron Wyden
United States Senator
